"Oh, whillikers," Cicero groaned one day, tossing a rope to the floor in disgust. "I'll never learn how to tie knots, Porky. If I don't learn, I can't get my knot-tying merit badge."

"Maybe the reason you're having such a tough time," Porky nodded wisely, "is because you're thinking too much of getting that merit badge and not enough of how important it is to learn to tie knots properly. Let's drive into the country, and I'll show you what I mean," he added, a shrewd plan taking shape in his active brain.

Cicero agreed to this, and an hour later the pair arrived at their destination.

"Now, let's pretend you're out here camping," Porky said enthusiastically as he leaped from the car. The next instant he sprawled flat on the ground.

"Your shoelace came untied and you tripped on it," Cicero giggled. "You must have tied it with the wrong kind of knot."

"I guess so," Porky grinned. With a sly look, he begged, "Tie it correctly, will you, so it doesn't happen again."

Cicero put a foolproof knot in Porky's laces, then they walked over to where several small trees had been knocked askew by the wind.

"Let's say you have to build a lean-to," Porky suggested. "First thing you must do is drag some wood into your camp area."

Porky took one of the ropes Cicero was carrying and secured an end of it to a tree. "This is called a slipknot," he pointed out. "Now, give me a hand to pull this tree loose."

Cicero and Porky gripped the rope firmly and tugged hard. At the very first tug, the knot Porky had tied came loose, and they toppled backwards on top of each other.

"Phloop!" Porky grunted, getting up again. "The slipknot must have slipped."

"It sure did," Cicero snickered.

Cicero took over the knot tying, and in the next half-hour, they managed to free several of the trees. Using smaller branches for a roof, they made a lean-to, and Porky tied all the joints together with one of the ropes he had cut into suitable lengths.

"There," Porky said with another mysteriously sly gleam in his eyes. "How does that look to you?"

"Well," Cicero said doubtfully as they crept underneath the lean-to, "it looks all right, but do you think it would stand up in a windstorm?"

"Give it a shake and see," Porky grinned, just as if he knew the answer already.

Cicero shook one of the upright poles, and the next thing they knew, the whole affair came tumbling down on their heads.

"All the ropes came untied," Cicero laughed with glee as they untangled themselves. "I guess I'd better find somebody else to coach me, Porky. You're not doing so hot."

"Oh, yes I am," Porky laughed. "I set out to prove to you how important it is to learn to tie knots properly, and I think I've succeeded. You've seen the results of what happens when you don't."

"I sure have," Cicero grinned, ruefully rubbing his head. "It sure was tricky of you to tie all those knots wrong just to teach me a lesson."

"Those were not knots that I tied before," Porky chuckled. "They're the kind you're not supposed to tie. Now I'll show you the correct way to tie them," he added with a grin. "I've had enough bumps on the head for one day, and so have you."
